Your Next Job Will Likely Come From Someone You Know: 4 Networking Secrets

In today's tough job market, getting a hiring manager to even glance at your resume is a big ask. But many people who are moving up in their careers will tell you having connections is a large reason why.

Indeed's Career Guide says many employers prefer to hire candidates vetted by mutual contacts. Some businesses don't even list openings on company websites — they rely solely on internal networking.

If you're looking for a new gig but don't know how to leverage your connections to help, consider these four networking secrets:

Aim to win

It turns out that positive thinking might be more than an idyllic mindset everyone preaches. According to Willy Das and Samantha Dewalt for Harvard Business Network, those who approach interactions with other people aiming to get a positive result from the conversation are 17% more successful.

If you approach a potential networking opportunity fearful of rejection, you're less likely to have a positive outcome. Das and Dewalt write, ". . . never take rejection personally — realize that when a networking attempt doesn't work out with somebody, it may just be a mismatch of needs."

Go into every conversation hoping to make a helpful connection but also being okay with the fact that it might not be a good fit.

We are pleased to share information about our in-person BWF Workforce Development Rock Your Resume Workshop on Nov. 14 at the South Salt Lake Community Center. The resume workshop will start at 11 a.m., with job search expert Matt Hilbig giving practical guidance on how to create a clear, well-organized resume that effectively highlights your skills and experience. The session will cover formatting basics, strategies for tailoring your resume to specific roles, and tips for presenting your accomplishments in a concise and relevant way. Whether you're starting from scratch or updating an existing resume, the goal is to help you strengthen your document and feel more confident using it in your job search. There will also be time for questions and discussion. Lunch will be provided by Salt Lake Culinary Education after the workshop, and networking will continue until 1 p.m.
